'MOURNERS' FOR SLAIN IN ROCKEFELLER MINE BATTLES PARADE; ARE ARRESTED

Upton Sinclair and four women members of his band of "mourning pickets," who paraded in front of the Standard Oil offices, No. 26 Broadway, to-day as a protest against the killing of men, women and children in the Colorado strike war, were arrested after a throng that almost blocked traffic on Broadway had gathered.

As Sinclair and his followers were marched off to the station house, Mrs. Sinclair took her place as leader of a second band of mourners, all wearing black crepe around their left arms. In defiance of the police, who had been reinforced to quell any disturbance, they marched up and down, two abreast, from No. 16 to No. 30 Broadway. Sinclair said his wife had promised to be taken into custody in the event of his arrest, and she said she was ready to carry out the agreement.

The crowd grew steadily during the morning and at noon about 5,000 thronged the street. It was with great difficulty that the mounted police succeeded in keeping open a narrow lane for the trolley cars and other traffic.

The only disturbance occurred when a woman, carrying a huge banner, made her appearance shortly after noon. She was walking down the west side of Broadway when some one emptied a pail of water on her from an upper window. The aim was good and the woman was drenched.
